What happens on a Katchakilla murder mystery dinner or evening.

A team of professional actors will meet and greet you and your guests for pre-dinner drinks in character. (They will remain in character for the full duration of the event).

During this time you will need to keep your wits about you and listen out for any incriminating conversations or actions. You and your guests will then go into dinner. Once your guests are settled the crime begins to unfold.

The lead character will then announce how the investigations will run. Physical clues are uncovered such as maps of the scene of the crime, incriminating letters, secret codes and Pathology reports.

You will be invited to identify and interrogate the suspects during the course of the dinner. This is where a lot of the fun happens: All the suspects are entertaining, even if they appear surly or bundles of fun or completely bizarre, remember they are a suspect.

Around coffee time you will be asked to name the suspect you believe to be the killer. There will then be a 'reveal' as the killer is unmasked. Prize certificates are awarded for the best and silliest conclusions.

Duration is around three hours with little disruption to food service.

More than 25 years and over 3000 productions to date!

The world of intrigue and mystery.

The whole genre of murder mystery has held a fascination with the public for many years. Probably the most famous real life case was that of 'Jack the Ripper' credited as the first serial killer. The exploits of Sherlock Holmes in the world of fiction became the pioneering private detective in print during the late Victorian and Edwardian era.

In the UK the 'golden era' of crime writing in 1930's produced fantastic writers including Dorothy L Sayers, Margery Allingham and of course Agatha Christie. These writers created the classic world of eccentric characters. The crusty Military Majors, sleuthing Vicars, dubious adventurers, bright young things and a full range of amateur investigators and the official Police.
